Wickedly Fast Frontier Supercomputer Officially Ushers in the Next Era of Computing
Oak Ridge National Laboratory's Frontier supercomputer was crowned fastest on the planet in the semiannual Top500 list. Frontier more than doubled the speed of the last titleholder, Japan's Fugaku supercomputer, and is the first to officially clock speeds over a quintillion calculations a second—a milestone computing has pursued for 14 years. That's a big number. So before we go on, it's worth putting into more human terms. Imagine giving all 7.9 billion people on the planet a pencil and a list of simple arithmetic or multiplication problems. Now, ask everyone to solve one problem per second for four and half years. By marshaling the math skills of the Earth's population for a half-decade, you've now solved over a quintillion problems. Frontier can do the same work in a second, and keep it up indefinitely. A thousand years' worth of arithmetic by everyone on Earth would take Frontier just a little under four minutes. This blistering performance kicks off a new era known as exascale computing. Fasten your seatbelts for some very exciting discoveries!!

Awarenesswatch™ Paper Review

When URLs on Social Networks Become Invisible by Suay Melisa Ozkla, Maria Lompe, Mariangela Vespa, Estrid Serensen and Tianshi Zhao
https://firstmonday.org/ojs/index.php/fm/article/view/12568

Abstract:
Extant research has addressed various concerns of representativeness in digital social research including: bias in researchers' selection of online spaces, foci on single-platform approaches, and limited or skewed samples due to API (application programming interface) restrictions. This paper adds to that work through an illustration of tool bias towards specific social media logics (e.g., Twitter logics) in a URL-based network across/within social media sites (illustrative case study = greenwashing). These "biases" are implicit in design, mirror extant societal trends, and are reinforced through platform biases. As such, researchers using such tools (above all, non-computational scholars) may have little awareness of these subliminal influences. The paper consequently argues that (a) tool choices often fall prey to issues in representation, reinforcing existing biases on a subliminal level; and, that (b) non-platform-specific creative situational approaches (like cross-platform URL explorations) provide a much-needed understanding of wider platform dynamics that highlight such biases.
